"Dexter" ? need a more developed title that reflects your thesis.

In fiction, serial killers have the accompanying profile: remarkable knowledge joined with extraordinary perversion; they appreciate delivering on their exploited people different types of pain before killing them. They are creatures who live in segregation in horrible spots, have a day by day schedule that is organized in an over the top way and focus on everything. We never know how they acquire their living. Their fixation might be connected to a horrible involvement in their youth. Most occasions, they are partnered with the police, and are for all intents and purposes obscure by their neighbor, companions, and even in full sight of police specialists. They have a complex method for picking their unfortunate casualties and they design a custom of death to them. At times they even send letters to the press to make their rationality known.

and executing young men. Dexter just slaughters lawbreakers who have gotten away formal equity, however he is doing this so he can satisfy his hankering for the execute (Santaularia, 2010). Dexter describes, "Florida penitentiaries kick free 25,000 prisoners every year. They don't do that for me yet it beyond any doubt feels like it. I scan for the ones who feel like they beat the framework, they're not elusive" (Episode 3, Season 1). Dexter trusts that he is bringing the mayhem of the tainted equity framework back to request and thinks of it as his business to spare lives (Santaularia, 2010). All through the show he is always approving himself by saying that if people in general knew why he was doing it they would applaud him.

Harry Morgan went to the scene he chose to take Dexter and raise him. (Santaularia, 2010). He considers himself to be living in haziness and slaughtering just to endure, "Regardless of where we go we take ourselves and our harm with us. So is home the place we rushed to, or the place we keep running from? Just to hang out in spots we are acknowledged genuinely, places that vibe more like home to us. Since we can at last be our identity," (Season 7, Episode 8). Harry Morgan was the cop that discovered Dexter in this wreckage and continued to take him in as his very own child. As a result of the conditions, Dexter trusts that he can't control his natural and physiological make up; he considers himself to be an unfortunate casualty. The gathering of people may think that its hard to put the fault on Dexter on the grounds that they currently identify with his experience. In the deceived disappointments of numerous in the public arena who trust culprits go unpunished, Dexter can showcase the wrongdoing that lives in our psyches. This transgression is the demonstration of rebuffing the individuals who are mercilessly murdering blameless individuals (Quintero, 2010).

This is a good start and interesting subject. I like how you laid out the commonalities of serial killers in fiction, and set up that Dexter is a departure. You've done a good job when quoting from show and starting to delve into the criticism & theory underlying his behavior. However, much more evidence is required to support your theories and analysis. Where are these "traits" & behaviors coming from? What is the psychology behind viewers' preoccupation with serial killers & this need to humanize them? What is the psychology behind serial killers in general & how is Dexter different? What does the creator/director/writing team say about the show? Provide more examples from the show and a synopsis/background about it. Be very careful with your citations.
